Short description:

Postmodernism is a much theorized and widely discussed cultural expression which is notoriously difficult to pin down yet has a host of vociferous advocates and detractors. Postmodern tendencies have been identified in almost all areas of cultural production, including literature, architecture, television, music videos and music. This seminar examines the way in which films from the late 1960s to the present day can be read through the theories of postmodernism. We explore formal features such as fragmented narratives, non-linear chronology and pastiche alongside philosophical concerns such as a general suspicion of unified subjectivity, authorship and metanarratives. Our ultimate aim is to evaluate postmodern film in terms of its political, social and ethical effects. Does postmodernism open our eyes to the “real” conditions of late capitalism, or does it encourage them to glaze over under a barrage of meaningless images?
