Semester

Spring 2022

Short Description

Despite the scientific and secular connotations of media technologies, a full comprehension of their histories, cultural meanings, contemporary practices, and even possible futures, requires an exploration of their intricate relationships with the domain of religion. The seminar engages "the trinity" of religion-media-technology from as early as the Jewish Golem myth, Islam's scientific golden age, and the rise of technological utopianism in mediaeval Christianity, through the 19th century technological occult and spiritualism, and up to futuristic discourses of technology as a religion. A major part of the seminar will focus on the present, exploring the mutual shaping of world religions and new media (cyberspace, smartphones, and video games) by identifying shifts in religious identities, communities, authority, and authenticity of ritual practice, alongside the appropriation and reconfiguration of technologies for religious purposes. Adopting religiosity as an interpretive lens or a sensitivity in digital cultural studies, will offer students a surprising perspective and unique grasp of some aspects of their contemporary secular digital lives.
