Short Description
“Man is an invention of recent date” observes Michel Foucault, “and one perhaps nearing its end.” He goes on to note that under the right conditions, “man would be erased, like a face drawn in sand at the edge of the sea.” This course starts from the premise that “man” is a construct which has been invented by the discourses of humanism. We will explore the ways in which the borders of “man” have been secured in opposition to the nonhuman, specifically “animals” and machines, and we will interrogate the effects and consequences of this set of exclusions. Of particular interest will be the violent manner in which nonhumans have been excluded in order to secure the supremacy of the human animal. As with all limits, there is a fascinating contamination and comingling between the human and the nonhuman and we will explore how this dangerous place appears in literature, art, film, television and theory. From the beginning, the human has been dependent on technology and we will chart how technologies, both ancient and modern have both made and unmade the animal that we call the human. By the end of the course, you should have an insight into the fascinating ways in which the human will, perhaps, always have been posthuman.
